My name is Don Schreiber and I'm the owner of Town and Country Pharmacies, Inc. My company has been in the pharmacy industry since 2002, and we're based in St. Louis with eight locations and 90 employees across 5 states. My Mastermind Alliance group consists of eight business owners with a similar level of experience and expertise. We've all managed our companies to a strong level of success, but we're all looking for even more insight and achievement, and we've determined that surrounding ourselves with other leaders is the best way to build our strengths.

At our Mastermind Alliance meetings we discuss the most important problems we face, what we're doing and what we've tried, and the successes and mistakes we've all seen. In fact, one of the real advantages of working with a Mastermind Alliance is that we can bring up any topic, and we know we'll get strong, honest feedback and advice from insiders with real expertise. We've all spent thousands of dollars on consultants in the past, but now find we're the best possible consultants for each other. And while the group isn't there to specifically create sales leads, we're all connected in the community and we're always aware of how we can help each other find new opportunities. Altogether, my fellow masterminds help me in ways that only experienced dedicated peers can, and I do the same for them.

This is the group that helps me solve my toughest problems, from finance and ownership details to employees and legal concerns, and everything in between. It's also the group that introduces me to a number of topics that I may never have considered, bringing real expertise and unbiased information to my attention.

As you know, time is always in short supply for business owners. But I've found that meeting with my industry peers is one of the best ways I can use that limited time to help my business grow.
